TAKING CARE OF YOURSELF

Loss is real. It is no secret that an emotional wound like a significant loss can affect every part of one's being. It truly is amazing at how we are created. Think of what an everyday headache can do for you. Your eyes become extra sensitive, you may feel nauseated, your temper is short. You want to withdraw from others, you lack energy and drive.

If you have a heartache, instead of a headache, you are also going to hurt in many different ways. A part of you has been ripped away. One author wrote – "Many people describe deep loss as though someone cut something out of me and left a gaping, bleeding hole. Such wounds will not passively heal themselves with the mere passage of time. They need active attention and mending."

I want to encourage you to do a few things, at the very least:

1. TAKE CARE OF YOUR PHYSICAL SELF. We don't always anticipate the physical toll that grieving takes. Losing a loved one is a highly stressful experience. And stress can create many kinds of physical responses—ulcers, high blood pressure, back pain, etc. You may feel tired with little initiative. You may sleep too little or too much. Take care of yourself. Physical movement has a wonderful benefit of triggering chemicals in your body that relieve pain, reduce, and generally improve your sense of wellbeing.

2. TAKE CARE OF YOUR EMOTIONAL SELF. Healthy Attitudes are so vital. Our approach to living must be one of commitment and control. Believe that you can influence events and act, rather than be a victim of circumstances. Accept the challenge of change as prompting personal growth. Deal with all the painful emotions you are feeling – the anger, sorrow, loss, confusion, bitterness. Face them, feel them, express them to yourself, to God, and others. As time allows, take time alone to process what has happened, to remember, to think, to dream.
